So too it is with our complex daily lives. While in the midst of the rush we cannot accurately analyze ourselves and our actions. It is only through stepping back in time that they become clear.

Following upon this principle is the idea of looking back on college life in order to judge ourselves objectively. We should . . . have the knack of sleeping decide first what we want to get out of college and then, in looking, determine whether or not we are attaining our goal. If we are, no more need be said. But if we are not-if something is missing from the complete picture—it is time we stopped to think where the fault might lie. Generally, it is true that the more we give of ourselves, the more we will receive. Therefore, any deficiency probably springs from within, and could be traced to selfishness. We do not derive all benefits from college because we do not exert ourselves in all ways. Maintaining good balance of spiritual, social and intellectual activities, although a difficult task, is essential to a harmonious, worthwhile existence.

So, take another look at your way of life-do you like what you see? Remember, you are the only one who can change it.
